The Hanging at Farmington.

[From a Special Dispatch to the Republican.] DE LASSUS, Mo., Jan. 23.—Chas. H Hardin, perpetrator of one of the gravest crimes that has been committed in Southeast Missouri for the past twenty years, passed the last seven days of his many other questions not of so much life in hopeless anxiety, walking to and recorded by with the exactness of hours, the moments as days. From the date of his confinement Hardin's features underwent a gradual change, and his language and actions correspondingly varied. At all times, however, he had hoped that some unknown power might interfere and preserve him from the penalty about to be inflicted, though he never gave any sign of fear, at all times act in that bull-dog, independent manner which characterizes the criminal of the basest grade. In stature, C. H. Hardin was short, and in weight, light. His hair was dark brown and clothed a head by no means indicating in its shape a remarkable degree of intelligence.
